“Jingo Fever is a fine historical novel that will ring well with youthful readers . . .”— Midwest Book Review

Book of the Year Award (finalist, Juvenile Fiction)

This middle-grade historical novel, set in 1918 during World War I in a small Midwestern town, deals in a quiet, thoughtful way with the effects of anti-ethnic bigotry (towards German-Americans) during wartime conflicts abroad.

Young Adelle Klein is a German-American girl who has come from Milwaukee with her mother to live for the summer of 1918 with Uncle Mike in Ashland, a small town in northern Wisconsin on the shores of Lake Superior.

Adelle struggles to cope with the local patriotic fervor, in support of American troops abroad, but spilling over into a hatred of all things of German origin.

As she seeks friendships with local youngsters her age, she wonders how to deal with the bigotry of anti-German sentiment, which escalates with the approach of the July 4th celebration. In the meantime, she and her mother worry about Adelle's brother, Karl, a young man of German-American descent who is fighting with the U.S. troops in France.

The summer's events will teach Adelle about the importance of standing up for what's right.
